This is a public safety announcement brought to you by the National Health Service. Your seatbelt is one of the simplest, most effective ways to protect yourself on the road. When used correctly, it can reduce in half the risk of a serious injury or death from a crash. No matter how short the journey, always remember to buckle up every time. Even on short drives, your seatbelt should be on. The lap belt should be across your hips and the shoulder belt should rest across your chest and not behind your back or under your arm. Stay safe and drive smart!

Jack (Man): Hey, Samantha! How's your morning going?

Samantha (Woman): Not bad, Jack. I'm just trying to deal with this crazy weather. It's so humid today – I'm ready for the autumn already.

Jack: Yeah, it's been way too hot for my liking too. I wish I could stay in the office all day where there's air conditioning.

Samantha: Lucky you. I've got to walk across campus for classes. The walk from the parking lot to the lecture hall feels like a marathon in this heat.

Jack: You're still in college, right? How's that going?

Samantha: Pretty good, but I have too many projects at the moment. My next big paper is due next week, so I'm a little stressed.

Jack: I can imagine. Work has been stressful at my end, too. We're launching a new product soon, and the deadlines are coming up fast.

Samantha: Sounds intense. Are you finding any time to relax? I've been watching that new mystery show "Silent Hill" to unwind.

Jack: I've watched a few episodes of it – it's really good! I also saw the new superhero movie on that big screen last weekend. Great special effects, but the plot was kind of weak.

Samantha: Good to know. Maybe I'll go see it with my friends when I have time. Anyway, good luck with the product launch, and let's hope the weather cools down soon!

John: Thanks, and good luck with your paper!

Not long ago, the idea of planets orbiting faraway stars was nothing more than science fiction. Today, powerful telescopes have found thousands of these "exoplanets", each with its own set of surprises. Some are massive gas giants located close to their parent star, while others are rocky spheres that might be covered with oceans.

One star system, TRAPPIST-1, has seven Earth-sized planets going round a cool red dwarf star. Astronomers think some of these planets might have what it takes to support life, including liquid water. By studying their atmospheres – using tools like the James Webb Space Telescope – we can detect chemical clues that might point to alien life.

Finding a planet similar to our own challenges what we know about the universe. Each discovery helps us understand more and more, and invites us to dream bigger. Who knows – our next discovery might be a planet that's not just habitable, but inhabited.

Task Five

You will hear a text twice. Before you listen to it for the first time, you have 1 minute and 30 seconds to read the tasks to the text. After you listen to it for the first time, you have 1 minute and 30 seconds to mark your chosen answers on your answer sheet. While listening to the text for a second time, you can mark your chosen answers. After you listen to the text for the second time, you have 1 minute and 30 seconds more to check or correct your answers.

Interviewer: Here in the studio today we have Professor James Redford. Welcome, professor. Can you tell us a little about your education and work experience?

Professor: I earned a PhD in Sociology from Redwood University, where I focused on social policies and helping communities grow. After finishing my studies, I worked with local government agencies on housing and city planning. Later, I returned to teaching, and now I run classes on research methods and how to connect with communities.

Interviewer: What made you interested in social sciences, and what have you learned from it?

Professor: Well, I've always been curious about how societies work and how things like culture, money, and politics shape the way people behave. Social sciences help us study these ideas in a clear and organized way, uncovering patterns we might not notice otherwise. This helps us understand big issues like inequality or social conflict and figure out better ways to solve them.

Interviewer: How do you think social sciences affect the world around us?

Professor: Social sciences play an important role in making decisions. For example, policymakers use research to create laws about public health or education. Businesses also use insights from sociology to understand their customers and improve how their teams work together. Social science research influences everything, from small local projects to big global strategies, helping people adapt to changes in society and the economy.

Interviewer: Could you share a fun fact or an interesting story from your teaching experience?

Professor: One of my favourite memories was when I asked my students to interview people in their neighbourhoods for a project. Many came back with surprising stories. One student met someone who was so happy to share her thoughts that she gave him a homemade pie as a thank-you gift! The project taught my students the value of talking directly with people and showed them how meaningful those connections can be.
